From the visionary planning to the exceptional educational excellence, Stanford is distinct among institutions of higher education. Virtually, no one else offers the kind of opportunities that the university provides to its students. Today, the Freidenriches are committed to ensuring that Stanford stays true to its mission of excellence and innovation.

What sets a support foundation apart from other philanthropic organizations is that it is a true endowment. It is established to support a specific activity or program at the university for an indefinite period of time. Because it is an endowed fund, donors retain the right to select the beneficiaries and to determine the amount of the distribution to be made from the fund, if any, as well as the frequency and form of the distribution. The endowment provides a unique opportunity for the Freidenrich Support Foundation to be involved in the future of the university.

Why did you and Jill choose this approach?

"What's more, we have a lot of confidence that the university understands this approach and is committed to the future of the university. Our support foundation is designed to be a long-term investment in the university. It will support the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research and the Freidenrich Breast Center, and it will help to fund other important initiatives at the university."

"What's more, we have a lot of confidence that the university understands this approach and is committed to the future of the university. Our support foundation is designed to be a long-term investment in the university. It will support the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research and the Freidenrich Breast Center, and it will help to fund other important initiatives at the university."

Driving the Future of Medicine

The Freidenrich Support Foundation

The Freidenrich Support Foundation was established in 1994 with a $50 million gift, the largest ever at the time. The foundation has since raised an additional $200 million, bringing the total to $250 million. The foundation was established in the name of John and Jill Freidenrich to support the School of Medicine at Stanford University. The foundation is managed by the Office of Development at Stanford University.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation has supported a wide range of initiatives at the University of California, Davis, including the construction of the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research and the Freidenrich Breast Center. The foundation has also supported the construction of the Freidenrich Family Gallery at the Stanford Cantor Arts Center and the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research at the Stanford School of Medicine.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation was established in 1994 with a $50 million gift, the largest ever at the time. The foundation has since raised an additional $200 million, bringing the total to $250 million. The foundation was established in the name of John and Jill Freidenrich to support the School of Medicine at Stanford University. The foundation is managed by the Office of Development at Stanford University.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation has supported a wide range of initiatives at the University of California, Davis, including the construction of the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research and the Freidenrich Breast Center. The foundation has also supported the construction of the Freidenrich Family Gallery at the Stanford Cantor Arts Center and the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research at the Stanford School of Medicine.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation was established in 1994 with a $50 million gift, the largest ever at the time. The foundation has since raised an additional $200 million, bringing the total to $250 million. The foundation was established in the name of John and Jill Freidenrich to support the School of Medicine at Stanford University. The foundation is managed by the Office of Development at Stanford University.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation has supported a wide range of initiatives at the University of California, Davis, including the construction of the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research and the Freidenrich Breast Center. The foundation has also supported the construction of the Freidenrich Family Gallery at the Stanford Cantor Arts Center and the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research at the Stanford School of Medicine.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation was established in 1994 with a $50 million gift, the largest ever at the time. The foundation has since raised an additional $200 million, bringing the total to $250 million. The foundation was established in the name of John and Jill Freidenrich to support the School of Medicine at Stanford University. The foundation is managed by the Office of Development at Stanford University.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation has supported a wide range of initiatives at the University of California, Davis, including the construction of the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research and the Freidenrich Breast Center. The foundation has also supported the construction of the Freidenrich Family Gallery at the Stanford Cantor Arts Center and the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research at the Stanford School of Medicine.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation was established in 1994 with a $50 million gift, the largest ever at the time. The foundation has since raised an additional $200 million, bringing the total to $250 million. The foundation was established in the name of John and Jill Freidenrich to support the School of Medicine at Stanford University. The foundation is managed by the Office of Development at Stanford University.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation has supported a wide range of initiatives at the University of California, Davis, including the construction of the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research and the Freidenrich Breast Center. The foundation has also supported the construction of the Freidenrich Family Gallery at the Stanford Cantor Arts Center and the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research at the Stanford School of Medicine.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation was established in 1994 with a $50 million gift, the largest ever at the time. The foundation has since raised an additional $200 million, bringing the total to $250 million. The foundation was established in the name of John and Jill Freidenrich to support the School of Medicine at Stanford University. The foundation is managed by the Office of Development at Stanford University.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation has supported a wide range of initiatives at the University of California, Davis, including the construction of the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research and the Freidenrich Breast Center. The foundation has also supported the construction of the Freidenrich Family Gallery at the Stanford Cantor Arts Center and the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research at the Stanford School of Medicine.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation was established in 1994 with a $50 million gift, the largest ever at the time. The foundation has since raised an additional $200 million, bringing the total to $250 million. The foundation was established in the name of John and Jill Freidenrich to support the School of Medicine at Stanford University. The foundation is managed by the Office of Development at Stanford University.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation has supported a wide range of initiatives at the University of California, Davis, including the construction of the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research and the Freidenrich Breast Center. The foundation has also supported the construction of the Freidenrich Family Gallery at the Stanford Cantor Arts Center and the Freidenrich Center for Translational Research at the Stanford School of Medicine.

The Freidenrich Support Foundation was established in 1994 with a $50 million gift, the largest ever at the time. The foundation has since raised an additional $200 million, bringing the total to $250 million. The foundation was established in the name of John and Jill Freidenrich to support the School of Medicine at Stanford University. The foundation is managed by the Office of Development at Stanford University.